Democratic Progress.

The speech of Senator Vest, defining the faith and purposes of the Democratic party, is chiefly remarkable as a confession that such party has not today a single principle that it can call its own. In all the last eventful and progressive quarter of a century it has originated absolutely no issue or policy, but has been content to adopt one after another of certain Republican sentiments, after trying it utmost to discredit and defeat them.

When Senator Vest and other Democratic orators talk about the courage and consistency of such a party they insult the popular intelligence. Its history for the last twenty-five years is a record of the most shameful cowardice, evasion and staidity. I have been on the wrong side of every great public question until the right side has won the victory, and then it has moved forward only in time to see the Republican party advance another step. With all its opportunities to originate measures of general interest and advantage, it has offered the country nothing but a tardy and enforced adoption of principles and policies already consummated by Republican power and skill. Its platforms, so far as they relate to matters which have engaged popular attention since the war, are simply acknowledgments that the Republican party had been uniformly right, and that the Democratic policy of obstruction and resistance has been uniformly wrong. The cow would stand to-day right where she stood at the close of the war if she had not been pulled from one point to another in spite of herself. The energy of the party has been persistently expended upon schemes of obnoxiousness to the nation, and when it has done a decent thing the act has been one of compulsion, and of reconciliation to a result which it could not prevent. It may be expected to progress, we suppose, but only so fast as it shall be able to oblige or to compromise with the Republican party. It is not to do more than this, and are not ashamed to praise and defend it when it thus exposes itself to general scorn and reproach.—Globe Democrat.

"Blood-food" is the suggestive name often given to Ayer's Sarsaparilla, because of its blood-enriching qualities.

Geo. W. Mahn, druggist, of Hotel Bun, Mo., says: Tongue has cured a great number of obstinate cases of rheumatism within my knowledge. I have had parties come fifteen miles to procure a bottle of it.

Eighteen months of Democratic administration have come and gone, and the good times promised are still a myth. Instead, we have low prices for produce; labor demoralized all over the country; money growing tighter every day; lack of confidence in business circles; starvation staring thousands in the face; nothing to meet the demands and exigencies of the situation. From the last presidential election to this day affairs have been growing worse. A change was demanded. We have it. From peace and plenty to turmoil and poverty; from good prices and prosperity to prices and a struggle for existence; from quiet and contentment to excitement and frenzy. Oh! these are glorious Democratic times! How do you like them?

Henri Waterson in Courier Journal: "The Democratic party was late enough two years ago to secure a majority in the house; but what a victory worth! Has it not down expenses to any considerable extent? Has it not any degree improved currency? Has it done anything whatever to relieve the industrial depression? Did the party's majority in the house prevent the passage of an extravagant river and harbor bill? Are pension bills in danger because the Democrats control the committee? And most important of all, has a Democratic victory lightened taxation at any point or diminished the annual surplus; a surplus which is the one excuse for extravagant appropriations and the cause of corrupt legislation? In fact, it was to all intents a fruitless victory."

PREVENTION is better than cure, keeping health is better and easier than getting well. Saving money is having it, waste of anything is foolish, suicidal and wicked. Waste of labor on a farm requires a waste of money to pay for it. Suppressing little weeds which are lying on what would otherwise be the life-blood of your better crops. We have in mind gardens where a half peck of weeds could not be found on an acre of land; others where each square rod yields weed food enough to keep a hog busy in his pen, and by the same token, weed seed enough to seed quite a farm each succeeding season. On the first farm one man could keep several acres in high culture, while on the other a constant fight must be kept up to get even a fair return. At haying time the weedy gardens become weedy, and by fall the weeds have full possession. Which pays best, the prevention or the cure system?

Capt. Coleman, schr. Weymouth, plying between Atlantic City and Y. Y. had been troubled with a cough so he was unable to sleep, and was induced to try Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. Letter from Col. James H. Birch to Senator Vest.

St. Joseph, Mo. August 24, 1880.
Hon. George C. Vest, Kansas City, Mo.
My dear Senator: In your recent speech in the Democratic State Convention, you took occasion to sharply define the line separating a Democrat from his political adversaries. Ignoring the wonderful political revolt on that quarter of a century, you declare that the Democrat of to-day should be the Democrat as he came from the hands of Mr. Madison 160 years ago. The convention, under the inspiration of your speech, embodied its principles in the platform. I have not been oblivious to the fact since that end would be reached and acted upon—and have for a long period tried to impress my fellow Democrats and associates that I was no longer a Democrat; that I was forward by the necessities and demands of the present and the inevitable issues of the future, I tried by the standard of a strict construction of the constitution, as maintained by the founders of the party, I could not answer roll call. Months ago in a communication to your colleague in the Senate I said that I found myself drifting away from the moorings of the party and that unless it enlarged the basis of its action—as since interpreted by you—it would be unable to meet the great questions of the future, which in my judgment would make the next decade the most interesting political epoch in our history, and to solve and settle them as I thought they should be solved and settled. It did indulge in the hope, however, that it would move forward and not cling to a policy which although equal to the issue of its day and generation, was totally inadequate to the present and would prove itself utterly so with reference to the future. These political questions, you have evidently foreseen, awakened the necessity in your emotion of forestalling the action of the Democracy by reasserting a principle which would commit it to your views.

One good result will flow from your action. It reasserts the issue of the antebellum days. It places parties on a fundamental question, by which every subordinate one should be tested and it separates the people, as it did then, into two classes upon a simple question involving the character and powers of the federal government under the constitution. Unlike you, our government with enlarged powers has no terrors for me. It should have all the power necessary to maintain itself in the grand presence it has attained, not simply in the eyes of the civilized world, but in our own also. I am therefore compelled to dissent from that standard insisted upon by you and the promulgated by the state convention. It, then, makes me a less a Democrat than I have been, it is because the question, being of the highest essence permits no dissent. Very truly yours, James H. Birch.

Tea of sorts with headache, stomach disorder, torpid liver, pain in back, constipation, etc., need not pay for it. One dose of Dr. King's New Discovery will give relief. A few doses restore to new health and vigor.

Napoleon and Maria Louise.

London Times: Napoleon seems to have been as fond of his young wife as his selfishness and self-consciousness permitted; and after she had given him an heir he was more devoted than ever. To him his wife, when the birth endangered the life of the Empress, in real grief and anxiety he gave peremptory orders that the life of the mother was to be saved at any cost. The Austrian family, whatever they may have thought of the messianic, accepted M. de Saint-Arnaud publishes a very remarkable letter from the Empress of Austria to her formidable son-in-law, in which she expresses herself with regard to her step-daughter with the most tender affection and confidence. That it was written hypocritically we can hardly doubt, considering the antecedent and subsequent conduct of the writer, but all the same it is a significant proof of the ascendancy of Napoleon in the zenith of his power. As for Marie Louise, she liked her husband if she did not love him, but she felt apparently that he was removed from her to an immeasurable distance. They had very little in common. He initiated his wife rather than gave her orders, and she acquiesced. He disliked women interfering in public affairs or discussing them, and consequently there was no confidence between them in the matter nearest to her heart. And she never succeeded in acclimating herself in French society. The courtiers who were parvenues, distrusted "the Austrian woman," who could hardly fail to look down on them, while the old aristocracy of the Faubourg St. Germain resented the humiliation of her marriage. So while she gracefully acknowledged the acclamations of the crowd, she showed herself cold and reserved in court circles. She was still very young and inexperienced, and things would probably have steadily changed for the better had her husband never undertaken his Russian venture, or had he come back from Moscow in triumph. But when the world lost its faith in his star his wife's feelings changed altogether, and the weak woman who had only worshipped him in his power reverted to the prejudices of her early training.

Stanton and the Drummer Boy.

With all his gruffness, Stanton had a tender heart. A wounded soldier never got rough words from him, and a soldier's widow or a soldier's mother seldom went away with-out getting what she wanted. A story has been told of a little drummer boy who was disabled in the army and came to Washington, having been discharged for disability. He worked about the town in different ways as far as his health would permit, and waited for his papers by which he could get his pay and transportation home. Day after day he called at headquarters, but the army was on the move and the papers did not come.

The official in charge said he could do nothing until the papers came, and the ragged, barefooted, sick drummer boy would walk slowly away with a heart like lead and with tears rolling down his face. At last a man to whom he told his story advised him to go and see the Secretary of War himself.

The boy went to Stanton's house and rang the door bell. The servant told him he could not come in, and that he must go to the War Department. The boy replied that he had been there, but could get nobody to listen to him. Just at this moment Secretary Stanton's carriage drove up and Stanton got out. The boy approached him and Secretary Stanton listened to his sad story. He was doing so when Senator Sherman came up, and was about to address Secretary Stanton, when Stanton said: "Senator Sherman, I have no time to attend to you now. See this poor drummer boy. He has no money, no clothing. He has been discharged from the service, and he has been waiting here for his pay and transportation to get home to his mother. He says that the officials at the War Department won't give it to him." He then took the boy and went with his carriage back to the War Department. He wrote an order that the boy's money be paid at once and that he should be sent home, and then asked the boy to give him the (secretary's) regards to his mother and to all good mothers who had sons like him in the army, and then with a "God bless you" he bade him good bye.—National Tribune.
